F

F (ef), the sixth letter of the Roman alphabet, repr. Semitic waw, which expressed the sounds of w (approximately) and u. In early Greek writing the form F (retaining the 6th place in the alphabet) came to be appropriated to the consonantal use, while V or Y served for the vowel. Later, in the classical period, both the sound w and its sign F (called the DIGAMMA from its form) were lost. In the Roman adoption of the Gr. alphabet, and thence in OE., the sound given to the sixth letter was the voiceless labiodental spirant (f), or, between two vowels, the corresponding voiced spirant (v). In mod. Eng. F is always sounded (f), exc. in of, where it is voiced to (v) through absence of stress.

In MSS. a capital F was often written as ff. Hence, by a misunderstanding, the spelling of certain family names, e.g. Ffiennes, Ffoulkes, etc.

G

G (dʒī), the seventh letter of the Roman alphabet, was orig. a differentiated form of C, q. v. In Latin G represented the voiced guttural stop; but in the later period of the language it was probably pronounced before front vowels as a palatal.

In OE. the letter stood for four different sounds, viz. the voiced guttural and palatal stop (g, g), and the voiced guttural and palatal spirant (ɣ, ȝ). In early ME. the palatal stop developed into the complex sound (dʒ).

The form ȝ, here employed for ME. words, was commonly used in ME. for the sound of (y) initial and final, for the guttural and palatal unvoiced spirant final or before t (as in inouȝ, auȝt, niȝt), and, so long as the sound was in use, for the guttural voiced spirant. From the 13th c., however, the ȝ was by some scribes wholly or partly discarded for y or gh; a few texts have yh.
